Is it the way a course is organised, the teaching approach, the materials we are exposed to, the _____ (5) _____ group we find ourselves with, the physical infrastructure, the number and nature of assignments given, the commitment of the teacher...? The list can go _____ (6) _____. If we think back to the moments in our journey through formal education, we might find that at different points in time, we can give credit to one or other of _____ (7) _____ elements. Research has shown that in primary school, one of the biggest differentiators is the teacher and the way in which she/he _____ (8) _____ to students. To a large extent, our choices about what we would like to study and our preferences for subjects can be traced back to who taught us in early school and how. But as we move higher up the education ladder, the external factors ----- teacher quality, materials, infrastructure, and so on —matter less, even if their importance does not completely _____ (9) _____. Internal factors such as motivation, application, effort, interest, and perseverance become key to learning. It is hard for even the most gifted teacher to "make" someone learn at the high school or college level, without the presence of these internal drivers.
